

Acknowledgments

This seventh edition of Braddom's Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation has been made possible by the efforts of more than 100 authors—physiatrists and other rehabilitation professionals from a wide range of practice settings, backgrounds, and specialty areas who have given their time, effort, and knowledge because of their commitment and dedication to the field and to the individuals with disability who they continually strive to partner with to enhance their lives. These colleagues and friends have my deepest gratitude and respect for their contributions. The individuals who have helped, guided, persuaded, cajoled, and at times “strongly encouraged” all of these brilliant authors are the six associate editors—Karen Kowalske, Michelle Miller, Blessen Eapen, Jeffery Johns, Amy Bowles, and Henry Lew—who truly have been the force driving the process forward and getting the very best for each of the chapters and topic areas. I am thankful for their diligence, oversight, and persistence. The editorial team at Elsevier, led tirelessly by our Content Strategist, Mary Hegeler; Senior Content Development Specialist, Jennifer Shreiner; and Health Content Book Specialist, Kamatchi Madhavan, have been the consummate professionals and have again proven themselves to be the best of the best.

Finally, a special thanks goes out to the mentors, professors, teachers, and practitioners who have helped to educate, shape, and train all of the individuals who contributed to this foundational textbook, for it is through their efforts over the past several decades that there exist so many skilled and dedicated professionals who could bring this book together. Just as with the best physical and rehabilitation medicine practices across the globe, it takes a dedicated team of professionals working in harmony to achieve the best outcomes. This textbook is what happens when those people work together for the advancement of the field—a great outcome. My warmest thanks.
